My Childhood

I was born in the city, and lived there for eight years, although my heart was in the wide open spaces where I could run wild.

While in town, our "neighborhood gang," as we were called cut many capers.

Very distinctly, I remember, when I was quite small, I was forbidden to play with fire, but I found a match, and lounched up "our gang" and set some leaves afire under the rain pipe. Should the leaves have been dry, serious trouble might have resulted, but my father sensed that since we were so quiet, we surely had to be up to something, so he investigated. The result was, I had to stay in the house one whole week, and watch the others indulge in my favorite games, such as cowboy, Indians, and the like.

was none were louder or more mischievous than I.

Another vision that spreads before my eyes as I sit here and bring the recollections of my childhood to life is a rather amusing incident involving my sister and I. Our family had gone to look for a farm. About a half mile from the house, down the road, was a large mudhole, extremely large. While passing it we received a cold shower, without towels. Right then Mary Ann (my sister) and I decided to come back and go wading, but we kept it a secret, for if dad knew, he wouldn't let us go, as we weren't to venture far from the house. While the family was busy looking at the house, Mary Ann and I snaked off with our prize possessions, our dolls, to our heavenly spot. About the time we were in the midst of our fun, they missed us. Our little brothers were crying and daddy and mother were searching wells and any hole large enough for us to fall in. When struck to their dismay or rather disgust, they saw us in the mudhole. Since we gave them such a scare, they decided to do likewise. So getting in the car they proceeded in the opposite direction, for we presumed they would come back the same way they went, but they didn't. We were frantic and started to run. In the excitement, I dropped my doll and stepped on it. In an effort to regain it, I pulled its leg off, for I was standing on it. But they took pity on us and waited. After we were all settled in the car again in one happy family, we began pouring out our wondrous tale of the wonderful feeling of the mud oozing between our toes.

After moving out to the country, our chief "hangout" chief was the barn, and in the barn, in the winter, the hay was soft and warm, thus being our chief place to play.

It was in the barn where we learned various acrobatic stunts and learned to perform them with great skill in the eyes of the newcomers.

Our barn seemed to be the "hangout" for most of the "kids" in the neighborhood, for our hay was loose and others ~~were~~ baled hay.

Today I look back on the those days and say, "Did I do that?" But after all, I'm only human. — so here endeth today's streamlined essay on modern "kids."
